

Support from boss helped TB patient complete treatment

Childcare teacher given time off for clinic visits; TB control unit reassured parents about situation

Just two weeks after giving birth to her first child in 2015, Mrs K. Durga found herself back in the hospital. The childcare teacher had been experiencing chest pains and had difficulty breathing. A chest X-ray showed fluid in her lungs. She was hospitalised twice in the next month as doctors suspected pneumonia, and was separated from her baby for up to a week at a time. Just as she thought she was getting better, she was diagnosed with tuberculosis. Said Mrs Durga, 29, who is pregnant with her third child: "I remember crying and asking the doctor for a hug. I hadn't been wearing a mask at home, so the first thing that came to my mind was whether my child would be affected." As a precaution, the TB Control Unit (TBCU) at Tan Tock Seng Hospital (TTSH) screened her close contacts such as family members and colleagues for TB. Fortunately, none was affected. Today, Mrs Durga is sharing her story to raise awareness of the disease for the annual World Tuberculosis Day, which falls on March 24. Most TB patients are cured after six to nine months if they keep up with their treatment regime, said Dr Cynthia Chee, director and senior consultant at the TBCU. In Singapore, this typically means that the patient takes four drugs daily while supervised by a nurse under a programme called Directly Observed Therapy (DOT). Dr Chee said: "The treatment takes a long time. Many patients feel better after one or two months, so they think they can stop the treatment. But if they don't complete it, they can become infectious again or have a relapse. "That's why DOT, which ensures that every patient finishes the treatment properly, is so important." For Mrs Durga, the ordeal lasted more than 18 months, from October 2015 to May 2017, as she had a strain of TB resistant to Rifampicin, the most important of the four drugs used in TB treatment.

Most TB patients are cured after six to nine months if they keep up with their treatment regime, said Dr Cynthia Chee, director and senior consultant at the TB Control Unit at Tan Tock Seng Hospital. In Singapore, this typically means that the patient takes four drugs daily while supervised by a nurse under a programme called Directly Observed Therapy.

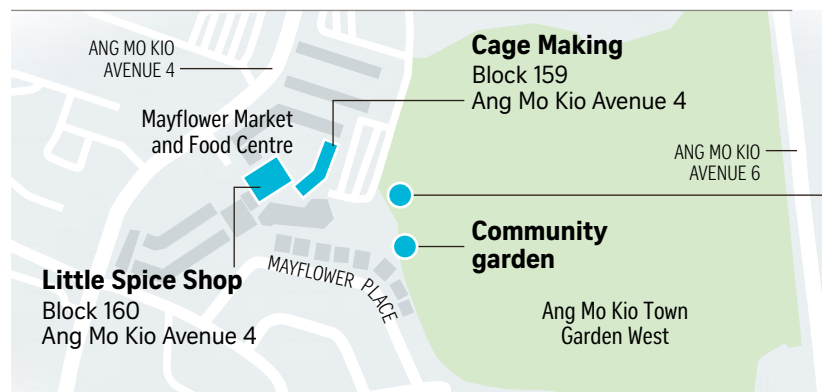

Although Mrs Durga was still on maternity leave when she was diagnosed, her boss Lim Cai Ying, principal of Star Learners childcare centre in Woodlands Circle, had to inform the children's parents that a person at the centre had TB. Ms Lim, 30, said: "At first, I was quite shocked. The only thing I knew about this condition was that it was highly contagious." But doctors from the TBCU explained to her that TB patients are no longer contagious after the second week of treatment and can return to work. The unit held a dialogue to reassure parents that the situation was under control. Under DOT, Mrs Durga had to make daily visits to the polyclinic.

When she returned to work in December 2015, she had to either wake up early to go to the polyclinic before going to work or use her lunch time to do so. On days when her schedule made this impossible, she would go to a clinic at TTSH after office hours. While she found the daily trips to the polyclinic often frustrating, Mrs Durga said Ms Lim's support in giving her flexible time off helped her stick with the treatment regime. Ms Lim said: "Even with her absences, which we could accommodate, she tried her best to keep her attendance regular. "In terms of delivering the curriculum and handling the children, her illness did not compromise her work performance." To protect Mrs Durga's privacy, the TBCU and the school did not reveal her identity to the parents. While most of the parents were understanding, some chose to withdraw their children from the centre. Still, Ms Lim said she never considered terminating Mrs Durga's employment as she is "very responsible" and has been working at the centre for eight years. "There are many myths about TB that are just not true. As employers, we should be more informed and find out how we can support our staff, not put them through more emotional trauma by further stigmatising them," she added. Ahead of World TB Day tomorrow, non-profit healthcare provider Sata CommHealth and TTSH signed a memorandum of understanding yesterday to renew their DOT&Shop programme, which offers supermarket vouchers to needy TB patients as an incentive to complete DOT. Since it was launched in 2009, the programme has disbursed more than $600,000 worth of vouchers to over 2,200 patients. From this year, the programme will also offer cash reimbursements to defray transport costs for selected needy TB patients, after assessment by a medical social worker.

More tours offering visitors local experiences

At the Kebun Baru Bird Corner in Ang Mo Kio, ornate bird cages hang from poles in a large open field while their owners while away the time chatting under the shade. Working out of a nearby shop, Mr Teng Leng Foo, 72, is one of the few remaining specialists who handcraft cages for the prized merbok birds that compete in singing competitions every weekend. The bird corner and the shop are stops in Ang Mo Kio on one of 16 new local tours that made the shortlist of the Singapore Tourism Board's (STB) Tour Design Challenge last year. All will be launched by the end of this year. Among them are a walking tour for tea lovers and several that journey through the heartland. One by operator Oriental Travel and Tours follows the murals of local artist Yip Yew Chong, beginning with a series in Ang Mo Kio that evokes the nostalgia of kampung life. Other stops in the neighbourhood include the bird corner and a wet market spice stall offering tourist-friendly packaging. The tour operator's co-founder Jasmine Tan was retrenched from the advertising industry in 2012 and decided, after a few years of freelance work, to put her SkillsFuture credits towards a tourist guide course. This was where she met Mr Stanley Foo, with whom she founded Oriental Travel and Tours last year.

They qualified for funding from STB in designing their heartland tour in Ang Mo Kio, where Ms Tan lives. "For places like Universal Studios, tourists can go on their own. But without a tourist guide to bring them here, I don't think they can find these places," said Ms Tan, 50. While most customers are from the United States and Europe, locals do sometimes join in and discover hidden gems, she added. Mr Teng, who has spent 60 years in the cage-making trade, said only a few tourists buy the cages but "it is good that they can come here and learn about the hobbies of Singaporeans".
